THE AFTERMATH OF COVID-19

What will your office look like after COVID-19?

As some parts of the United States begin to open once again, many people will head back to their office or retail setting. We are all aware that many companies may be concerned with letting a large portion of their employees back to work and with that we may see some business owners make changes to the workplace setting. Here is a quick glimpse into a few changes that may see:

New Office Layouts?

With the COVID-19 virus spreading rapidly through human contact, both indirect and direct, it is assumed that office layouts may need to change. This does not mean a complete office makeover and expanding to double the space, but having employees focus on working from home if they prefer and keeping in office workers spread apart. Some offices are investing in dividers between cubicles to make employees feel protected. The open and collaborative office layout famously used by big co-working offices may begin to lose popularity.

Your Office Space Needs to Meet OSHA Safety and Health Requirements

OSHA and other state and federal agencies impose duties on companies to provide safe and healthy workplaces for its employees as well as for those individuals who come onsite like customers/clients, vendors and guests. In furtherance of this commitment, companies should take a conscientious and collaborative approach to prevention and precaution to address public health concerns related to pandemics, such as COVID-19.

A Pandemic Response Plan is Required
